Tom is a superficially socialised jungle commando.

He fixes you with his dark, penetrating gaze, and if he senses weakness or indecision, he will grab you by the throat until you rediscover commitment!

I first met Tom at a time when life had laid him low. At that point I thought Tom needed my help (and maybe he did). However, what quickly became obvious was that Tom was just returning to Base Camp for a season to regroup before challenging the next face of Everest.

Since that time about seven years ago, Tom, as my friend, has both led me and pushed me to examine my life and motivations, and he has been a catalyst for growth in my life. I strongly encouraged Tom to pursue life coaching as a career because I have experienced his powerful gifting in this area.

Tom is not for the faint hearted — but he will be a boon for the brave hearted person who has reached the point where they are prepared to wrestle with themselves and, in the process, unlock a richer potential for their lives.
